From The Rabbi's Study...

The Day After Passover

As you are reading this, Passover has recently ended. The countless hours of cleaning and preparing are over, our Seders have concluded, and many of us most likely rushed out to have that "traditional" pizza dinner as soon as the holiday ended. I must confess that each year as Passover winds down in my house I am a bit daunted by the task of cleaning up from the holiday, particularly when it comes to switching over all of the dishes, silverware, and food, as we prepare to go back to our "normal" lives. It seems like there is always so much to clean up and put away in order to set things in order in the house and to proceed on with the rest of the Jewish year. I am often very thoughtful and intentional about how and where I store things away so that I will remember them for next year. But while I put much work and thought into changing my surroundings back from "Passover" to "normal," I often fail to take a few moments for thoughtful reflection about how Passover has "changed" my life.

If our transition out of Passover places us in the same "state" as we were in before Passover, than we have missed something. The lessons of Passover are supposed to change us in some way. We are supposed to personalize the Passover experience by seeing ourselves as if we had actually left Egypt, is another way of saying that we are supposed to let the Passover experience be a transformative one. There are a number of inherent values that Passover is supposed to teach us. We are supposed to spend time remembering that we were slaves and pondering the implications of this part of our story as a people. We are taught to celebrate the Freedom that came out of this slavery by focusing on the meaning of freedom in our lives today as well as the world around us. We are reminded that we must be hospitable and caring towards one another and towards strangers because we were strangers in the land of Egypt. We celebrate the gift of food that most of us are privileged to have in abundance and acknowledge the responsibility to help all who are hungry in our community and in this world. Finally, we take time to explore our connection to the Jewish people from the time of the Exodus until today, reflecting upon our place in the narrative of the Jewish people. Each of these values are critical to the celebration of Passover, but if we move forward without exploring how these values have changed the way in which we live our daily lives than we have not taken full advantage of the meaning behind this wonderful holiday. So, now that you have (hopefully) finished all of the shlepping of your dishes from one cabinet to another, putting away the left over Passover cake meal, and donating those extra few boxes of matzah (because, of course, you had too many!) I invite you to take a few moments to think about how your "post Passover" experience will be different from your "pre Passover" one. Have the values and experiences of this holiday changed you in some way? How might your daily behavior be different because of your Passover celebration? Of all of the questions that you have asked on Passover, perhaps this is the most important one.

Yasher Koach to our Bar Mitzvah!

Hi. My name is Josh Estin and I live in Wayside with my parents and my older sister, Sam. I am in 7th grade at Twp. of Ocean Intermediate School. On April 20, 2013, I will become a Bar Mitzvah.

Last fall, I joined an organization called Hand in Hand. I was paired up with an 8 year old boy who has special needs and I go visit him for an hour each week. I play with him and his younger brother, which gives their babysitter a chance to make dinner while his parents are both still at work. Before I met him, I was nervous and never thought that I would have things in common with and be able to relate to a boy with autism. Now that I have gotten to know him, I love spending this time with him and look forward to it, even if I have a lot of homework to do or other activities that I am missing. He is very smart, loves sports like me and we both are HUGE Giants fans! He has become my friend and I intend to continue to see him every week until I go away to college. Although he waits for me by the window every week when it is time for me to arrive, I think I am getting even more out of this experience than he does. Hand in Hand has taught me to be very thankful for my good health, not to pre-judge people with disabilities, and that I can make a positive difference in someone's life.
